THE PRESERVATION OF THE EASTERN CULTURE HERITAGE IN RUSSIA

Since 16-17 centuries, the Russian academic elite formed strong scientific school of the Oriental studies, which focused on the issues of interaction between Russia and Asia. The Russian scientists were convinced that the historical destiny of Russia lies precisely in establishing close links with the Asian region. As a result, Russia had become home to a large number of famous scholars, whose researches and expertise on culture, languages, and philosophy of the peoples of the East. Furthermore, the Eurasianism concept, first appeared in 1921, recognized the necessity to renounce Russia’s orientation to the West and to assume a revision of Russian international relations with a greater emphasis than before on the role of the East.

Especially three important institutes are forefront in Russia for the preservation of the eastern culture heritage in the region. One of these institutes is the Institute of Oriental Manuscripts of the Russian Academy of Sciences, the other one is the State Museum of the East and the last one is The East Department at the Hermitage Museum. These three institutes have been significant in the research of cultural studies.

The main goals of the Institute of Oriental Manuscripts (IOM) of the Russian Academy of Sciences are the diversified fundamental research of the ancient and medieval East, the study of its history, philology, religion, philosophy and law by examining unique manuscripts and early printed books in the Oriental languages. The Institute was established on the basis of the Asian Museum in St. Petersburg, the oldest oriental research institution in Russia, founded under the Russian Academy of Sciences (RAS) in 1818. The Museum possesses a large collection of manuscripts in various Eastern languages, books on the history and culture of the East, as well as rarities belonging to different epochs and regions of the East including the manuscripts, block prints and lithographs of the Kunstkamera library (which was established by Peter the Great in 1714). Since 1917, the collections of the Museum have been one of the world’s largest specialized collections of manuscripts and early printed books of the countries of the East. The collection of manuscripts and early printed books includes more than 100,000 items in 65 languages. The IOM possesses also the Archives of the Orientalists that contain some documents and a specialized library of books, exceeding 800,000 volumes, on various branches of the Oriental studies.

Another major repository of the Eastern monuments is the State Museum of the East in Moscow, the only specialized museum in Russia, collections of which include artefacts representing more than 100 cultures of Asia and Africa including Far East, Middle East, South-East, South and Central Asia, North Caucasus and Transcaucasia, Siberia and Far North, Northern and Tropical Africa. The Museum possesses 150,000 pieces of art, nearly two-thirds of which are archaeological monuments. The vast majority of exhibits are originals dating from the Neolithic Age to the 21st century. The Museum was founded in 1918 and its name has changed several times (Ars Asiatica, Museum of Oriental Cultures, Museum of Oriental Art) constantly facing the risk of being disbandment. Nowadays, it turned into one of the important cultural, educational, research institution in the country, which holds a wide program of activities on an annual basis, including tea ceremonies, master classes and workshops, lectures, conferences for researchers and specialists in the Oriental studies.

The last institute that has a significant importance in preserving the Eastern cultural heritage in Russia is the East Department at the Hermitage Museum. The decision to create the East Department consisting of four sectors (the Ancient East sector, Middle East and Byzantium sector, Far East sector, Central Asia, the Caucasus and the Crimea sector) was made by the Council of the Hermitage Museum in 1920. Nowadays, the Department’s funds include more than 150,000 exhibits. In terms of chronological coverage, the East Department’s funds cannot be compared with the collections of other departments of the Hermitage Museum. In fact, since its foundation in 1754 the Hermitage Museum collected a rich collection of the Oriental art keeping together private royal family collections (the most outstanding monuments related to Peter the Great and Catherine the Great collections), purchased artifacts and monuments acquired through archaeological expeditions.

The East Department at the Hermitage launched a large number of permanent exhibitions and expositions, namely, Ancient Egypt (since 1987); Mesopotamia (since 2002); India (since 2004); the Caucasus and the Golden Horde (from 2006-2009); Japan (since 2009); Central Asia in antiquity and the early Middle Ages (since 2010); Central Asia (from 2013). It should be mentioned that the recently opened expeditions were based on the archaeological researches that were carried out within the framework of six Hermitage expeditions that conduct excavations in Siberia and the Altai, Crimea, Uzbekistan, Tajikistan, Kyrgyzstan and Kazakhstan.

In conclusion, it can be said that the Eastern cultures influenced the social, economic and cultural development of Russia. In the time of imperial Russia, the Russian authorities and academic community have laid a foundation for safeguarding and preserving the eastern culture heritage creating institutions that will form the core of the Russian school of the Oriental studies in future. Moreover, during the Soviet period the USSR authorities experienced a need for strengthening the soviet foreign policy toward the Eastern countries, which contributed to further enhancing the role of museums and research centers in preservation, research and popularization of the Oriental art and culture. Nowadays, Russia is interested in improving its state politics in the field of preservation of the eastern culture heritage by enhancing the legislative regulation of conservation, safeguarding, use and popularization of the cultural heritage monuments. Such an intention corresponds with announced in 2010 Russia’s “Turn to the East” foreign policy aimed at boosting relations with Asia’s growing economies.
