THREAT FROM AFGHANISTAN IN THE CENTRAL ASIAN SECURITY AGENDA

Over the past several years, the Central Asian republics have expressed their concern regarding the security issues ascending from the rising destabilization in Afghanistan. For many years, the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan has represented the most substantial security challenge for the Central Asian landscape. Therefore, the withdrawal of the military contingent of the International Security Assistance Forces (ISAF) led by the Western military alliance North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) from Afghanistan in 2014 had a significant impact on security implications in Central Asia and directly affected the international security aspects. Therefore, the threat of spreading of extremist ideas in the region caused by the activity of illegal armed groups on the territory of Afghanistan, namely, Taliban and ISIL/DAISH, can be called the main dispute arising after the end of the Operation Enduring Freedom-Afghanistan (OEF) carried out by the United States' military forces in the period of 2001-2014.

In a decade since the beginning of the military operation, NATO has peaked nearly 140,000 troops to Afghanistan. At the end of the OEF in December 2014 after the military withdrawal about 13,000 residual military were left for training and counter-terrorism processes, including 9,800 U.S. troops. Despite the intensified activities on stabilizing Afghanistan, the ultimate goal of totally eliminating the threat coming from terrorist organizations within the country has not been achieved. Despite the fact that coalition forces of the U.S. and the Western countries have significantly weakened the Taliban movement and provided presidential elections in Afghanistan in 2014, the socio-political and socio-economic disputes within Afghani stan have remained unresolved. For instance, the cross border drug trafficking has increased significantly during the years of the ISAF activity in the country causing direct threat to the Central Asian security. As the UN Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) has stated in the report named “Opiate Flows Through Northern Afghanistan and Central Asia: A Threat Assessment” conducted in 2012, about 90 tons of drug substances, such as heroin and opium are being produced on the territory of Afghanistan annually. Taking under consideration the fact that over 25% of the Afghan produced heroin passes through the Central Asian region, toward Tajikistan and onward to the European Peninsula, the problem of cross border drug trafficking is becoming more common.

Moreover, illegal border crossing in the Central Asian states provide an example of clear danger coming from the armed Afghan groups in terms of extremist fighters infiltrating the region. During the last years, members of Afghan terrorist organizations have attempted to cross Afghan-Tajik and Afghan-Turkmen borders number of times. In the beginning of March 2016, one of the armed Afghans was killed during a military operation and others were arrested at the Afghan-Tajik border by the Tajik border authorities. Sharing the longest border (1200 km) among the Central Asian states with the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan, Tajikistan can be identified as the most vulnerable republic of the region to the double threat coming from Taliban and ISIL/DAISH terrorist organizations. During 2014, Tajik Military documented more than 100 violations of the Tajik-Afghan border on behalf of the Afghan extremist groups and drug traffickers. Such incidents demonstrate the need for an extensive settlement of the Afghan problem among the Central Asian states as it represents threat to Central Asia as a whole.

It should be noted that the Central Asian states have contributed to both the peace making process and the NATO-led ISAF military operations in Afghanistan. For instance, the U.S. and NATO forces have used the Manas airbase, later transformed into the Manas International Transit Center, in Kyrgyzstan, until its closure in 2014. While Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan and Tajikistan have provided overflight rights for delivering military cargos to Afghanistan. Moreover, leaders of the Central Asian republics have advanced number of initiatives in order to focus regional players' attention on addressing the problem of peaceful settlement of the Afghan conflict. For instance, during the 2008 NATO’s Euro-Atlantic Partnership Council meeting in Bucharest, Romania, the President of the Republic of Uzbekistan, Islam Karimov, has made a proposal on establishing “6+3” Initiative aimed at diplomatic resolution of the Afghan conflict with the membership of six neighboring states plus the U.S., Russia and NATO, excluding the representatives from Afghanistan. The Foreign Minister of Uzbekistan, Abdulaziz Kamilov, reiterated the aforementioned initiative during the 67th session of the UN General Assembly in 2012. Another proposal has come along the 2009 Shanghai Cooperation Organization summit in Yekaterinburg, Russia, on behalf of the Tajik President, Imomali Rakhmon. He projected the provision of the Dushanbe Four, the meeting to be held in Dushanbe in order to discuss security and economy projects with the reference to the Afghan conflict. Moreover, in 2012 the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Kazakhstan, Yerzhan Kazykhunov, projected the construction of United Nations hub for Afghanistan that was to be located in Almaty. However, due to the lack of international support, no substantial results in formation of the Central Asian dialog platform on the issue of peaceful settlement of the Afghan conflict have been reached.

Therefore, when it comes to cooperation among the Central Asian countries in terms of security challenges coming from Afghanistan, united security framework has not been formed yet. The lack of collaboration among the Republics is the major obstacle.

To conclude, today all Central Asian Republics are disturbed by the rising security challenges coming from Afghanistan after the withdrawal of ISAF forces in 2014. The rise of extremism and an increase in terrorist attacks can negatively affect and destabilize the whole region of Central Asia. In order to make a step towards stabilization of Afghanistan, the Central Asian region should come up with a single policy framework and intensify their support to the southern neighbor in the framework of various economic projects positively contributing to economic and political stabilization within the disruptive state.
