ARMENIA – RUSSIA RELATIONS IN THE FRAMEWORK OF THE COLLECTIVE SECURITY TREATY ORGANIZATION

The Collective Security Treaty Organizations (CSTO) is a successor of the Collective Security Treaty (CST), which was signed on the 15th of May, 1992 by newly independent states such as Armenia, Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Russia and Tajikistan. Later in 1993, Belarus, Azerbaijan and Georgia joined the Treaty. As a result of gradual development in the framework of integration process, the CST was transformed into the CSTO in 2002. However, Azerbaijan, Georgia and Uzbekistan withdrew from the Treaty, and the organization was established by the six remaining member-states. In recent days, there are still same six members within the CSTO, but Afghanistan and Serbia joined as observer states. The CSTO is the only intergovernmental military alliance on the post-Soviet space. All members of the CSTO find the collective security as the necessary tool to ensure peace and stability in the region. The bilateral cooperation with Armenia in the framework of the CSTO introduces Russia’s membership as a considerable opportunity to maintain its influence in the South Caucasus. Armenia is the only country in the region which pursues pro-Russian foreign policy, while Georgia’s foreign policy turned towards the West as a result of the Rose Revolution 2003 and the Georgia War 2008, and Azerbaijan is pursuing a multi-vector approach between Russia and the western countries. Therefore, Russia perceives Armenia as a strategically important country in the region. For instance, Russia established its 102nd Military Base at Guymri in Northern Armenia and 3624th Air Base in Erebuni Airport near Yerevan. Moreover, about 5,000 troops, air and missile defense systems of Russia are stationed in Armenia. On August 20, 2010 Russia’s military presence in Armenia was extended till 2044 after signing a deal between the two countries.

Playing a dominant role in the CSTO, in recent days Russia’s military cooperation with Armenia is significantly active. In September 2015, the military drills “Aragats 2015” of the Armenian – Russian combined forces were held at Alagaz range. The aim of the military exercises was to coordinate joint actions and improve interaction between the Armenian and Russian units. Additionally, the exercise involved MiG – 29 aircrafts, Mi 8 helicopters, drones, tanks, air defense forces and rocket systems, artillery and other military equipment. On December 23, 2015, Russia and Armenia signed an agreement to form a Joint Air Defense System. Accordingly, Armenian air defenses will be strengthened and Russia will provide new air defense equipment, radios, radar systems and combat helicopters deployed to its territory. Moreover, in the beginning of 2016, Moscow granted Yerevan a $200 million loan to purchase Russian weapons including Smerch (Tornado) 300 mm rockets with a firing range of 70-90 kilometers and Igla-Ś portable air defense missile systems, and modernize its armed forces.

The power asymmetry within the organization with Russia’s military dominance represents the CSTO as a Russia-led organization. Therefore, the bilateral relationship between Armenia and Russia in the framework of the CSTO illustrates Russia as the main guarantor of security to Armenia. Indeed, challenging regional problems that stemmed from the conflict with Azerbaijan over Nagorno-Karabakh enclave presents a serious threat to Armenia’s security. Taking into account the Article 4 of the CSTO Treaty, which claims that in case of an act of aggression against a member-state, all the others member-states will provide necessary assistance including military one, Armenia relies on Russia’s assistance in any possible threat from Azerbaijan.

However, during the latest escalation over Nagorno-Karabakh that took place on April 2, 2016, it can be argued that Russia preferred to use the position of a mediator in the framework of the OSCE Minsk Group rather than a CSTO strategic ally for now. Russia put a certain effort to bring Azerbaijan and Armenia together for discussions. As a result, conflicting sides agreed to enact an immediate ceasefire in the Nagorno-Karabakh region. Nevertheless, Armenia was not satisfied by Russia’s supply of arms to the conflicting side. For instance, over the past five years, Azerbaijan has bought arms from Russia, which worth about $4 billion. Following this, arguably Moscow’s military assistance to Baku can be seen as the decision based on economic consideration since arms export revenues are one of the main sources for Russia’s economy.

To conclude, Armenia – Russia relations in the framework of the CSTO are mutually beneficial, however they pursue different objectives. While Armenia is interested to increase its defense capability, Russia’s aim is to maintain its influence in the South Caucasus region. Nevertheless, Armenia considers that Russia’s supply of weapons to Azerbaijan undermines the functioning of the CSTO.
